The State Department said it has temporarily restricted the entrance of Turkey to the United States, because of pressure from the Turkish government. The decision comes one day after Secretary of State John Kerry and Turkish Foreign Minister Mevlut Cavusoglu were scheduled to meet in Washington. Cavusoglu said the United States and Turkey agreed to stop their "toxic rhetoric," and "will strive to find a consensus together," in talks held between the two countries last week. The Turkish foreign minister's remarks, following the emergency meeting between President Recep Tayyip Erdogan and President Obama last week, were made at a press conference on Monday. "After the first meeting between Erdogan and Obama, we said 'We're ready to find a mutual agreement', but that could not happen yet, and now we are back to square one," he said. Turkey, which is an NATO member, says the U.S. put too much pressure on the Turkish government, as NATO support for the Syrian Kurds has allowed Turkey to intervene in northeastern Syria, in a battle with the People's Protection Units (YPG). Turkey has set up a buffer zone on its border in order to push back the YPG. The State Department said on Monday the Trump administration is "extremely concerned" about the situation along the Turkish border, and that the administration is consulting with Congress. "The United States stands in solidarity with Turkey and the people of Turkey in their effort to counter terrorist threats and threats to their national security," it said. This press release indicates this is probably not the end of the issue, and is part of a temporary restriction of entry, possibly a permanent one. We'll be watching to see what happens.
