Previous in vivo studies in humans have shown that extracts of edible sea snails (A. irradians, A. javanica, A. pagodatas, A. solida, A. squamosa) are not genotoxic, while the available in vitro studies indicate that extracts of species belonging to the genus Archipagoda are genotoxic. The present study investigated the genotoxicity in vitro of extracts of six edible species of sea snails belonging to the genus Archipagoda in different laboratories. Four of the extracts were in the presence of rat liver S9 microsomal fractions and two were incubated in a Salmonella typhimurium TA 100 test strain. The extracts were investigated for mutagenicity in the presence and absence of metabolic activation. Three samples of A. javanica, three of A. radians, and one of A. squamosa tested positive in the presence of S9; three samples of A. pagodatas tested positive in the presence of S9 and four were positive in the absence of S9.
