Description of the Related Art Polyarylene sulfides are used in various applications such as electrical and electronic parts, automotive parts, appliance parts, and the like, because of their excellent mechanical characteristics. However, at present, injection molding of the polyarylene sulfides requires high molding temperatures (e.g., 260° C. to 280° C.), because it is difficult to produce molded articles having good mechanical characteristics by processing at a relatively low temperature (e.g., 160° C. to 200° C.).

In order to improve the molding temperature, there are known methods of adding a processing aid having high thermal stability.

Such a processing aid is required to exhibit a peroxide decomposition reaction at high temperatures, to decompose into volatile components during molding, and to reduce the amount of adverse reactions with polyarylene sulfide. Examples of such processing aids include polyphenylene sulfide dispersants (PPS resin dispersant), sulfolane compounds, and the like. In recent years, a method of adding a peroxide as a processing aid that can increase the processing temperature is known to be effective for improving the molding temperature (see, e.g., Japanese Patent Application Laid-Open (JP-A) No. 2008-256930 and JP-A No. 2009-87161). However, when the PPS resin having a small molecular weight is used as a polyarylene sulfide resin, the PPS resin dispersant tends to bleed out during melt molding. As a result, the PPS resin may be exuded into the mold, and a molded article obtained by processing at a low temperature may exhibit bleeding of the PPS resin and insufficient mechanical characteristics 6d1f23a050
